important information

It is important to store these kits out of direct sunlight, away from strong smells (such as aromatherapy oils, herbs, etc.). We also recommend that they are stored away from magnets (in practice this means on opposite sides of the room except when they are being used). However, some practitioners use magnets in their testing procedures, and so far this has not caused any problem with the vials.

There are no problems with storing different kits in the same box, although you might want to organise them in a particular way for other reasons, e.g. it is fine to store bacteria vials and flower remedies in the same box, although you might want to store all your flower remedies together for logical reasons.

Some people seem concerned about bacteria, parasite and similar vials in some way 'contaminating' other vials, because such vials have a 'bad' energy. This concern is completely unnecessary, and, in fact, labelling test kit vials as containing 'bad' or 'good' energies does not stand up to any scrutiny at all. There are many bacteria that are helpful to the human body, e.g. gut bacteria make some B vitamins and vitamin K; other bacteria help the skin maintain its protective acid mantle. Homeopathic remedies are often made from lethal substances, e.g. snake venom or a highly toxic metal. A homeopathic remedy made from a 'benign' substance can cause much upset when used inappropriately. Many flower remedies are made from highly toxic material, e.g. monkshood or mistletoe.

Perhaps more importantly, viewing vials as 'bad' can lead you subconsciously to be nervous of using these vials, thus depriving clients of the most efficient way to help them.

The energy of these vials should not be viewed as 'good' or 'bad', but merely as 'appropriate' or 'inappropriate' at this time for this person.

If you are unclear how you would use the kits, download the book Energy Mismatch by Jane Thurnell-Read. This gives a simple but highly effective way to rebalance the body energetically around these substances.
